Carlos Marquez III

HE/HIM

Executive Director of the County Welfare
Directors Association of California

Carlos Marquez III is a seasoned advocate and recognized state association leader with nearly two decades of Capitol experience. Against the backdrop of some of the toughest policy fights in Sacramento, Carlos has built a record of major legislative and budget achievements on behalf of large and diverse membership organizations.

In past roles as inaugural executive director of ACLU California Action and senior vice president of the California Charter Schools Association, respectively, Carlos secured legislation and budget investments that target disparities in California's public safety and public education systems.

Carlos has also served as an advisor to safety net and anti-poverty advocates like the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities and Legal Assistance to the Elderly. Other past roles include leading HONOR Fund, a sponsored initiative of the Mexican American Legal Defense & Education Fund, and serving as deputy political director of the LGBTQ Victory Fund & Institute. Carlos began his career representing social workers and county eligibility workers while at SEIU Local 221. He is deeply passionate about and understands the transformative power of county safety net programs personally. As a child, Carlos interacted regularly with Tulare County Child Protective Services and narrowly avoided foster care.

Catrina Taylor, PhD, MSPH

SHE/HER

Surveillance and Research Section Chief and Director of the California Neurodegenerative Disease Registry and Parkinson's Disease Registry at CDPH

Catrina Taylor, PhD, MSPH is an experienced epidemiologist and has conducted chronic disease research and surveillance for over 20 years in the academic and public health sectors. Dr. Taylor has expertise in evaluating evidence-based interventions and use of health policies and data to inform surveillance, data reporting, data use, and policy implementation. Her work has contributed to health system changes in chronic disease-related medical care screenings and referrals; local level policy adoption to mitigate exposure to environmental irritants; and development of cross-sectoral strategies to report data and disseminate results for more effective adoption/implementation of evidence-based policies and practices to manage, treat, and prevent chronic disease.

The work of Dr. Taylor and her team contributes to public health research aimed toward advancing our understanding of cancer and neurodegenerative diseases. Her research endeavors have afforded her the opportunity to speak at state and local conferences, write peer-reviewed publications, engage health professionals around using surveillance data, developing case definitions for neurodegenerative diseases, health management practices and education, and development of public health protocols to address chronic disease and their associated disparities. She has a PhD in Public Health Policy Analysis from Saint Louis University and a Master of Science in Public Health degree from Meharry Medical College.

He is the primary leader for optimizing the system to support high quality and high value clinical care, research, education, and interoperability across all venues of the Health System. He leads teams of informaticists and analysts from various specialties and venues to design and deploy solutions, and the strategies to support change. Current key initiatives include AI implementations, as well as several organizational operational priorities. As the co-chair of the Care Everywhere Regional User's group, he has led optimization and standardization of health information exchange across California organizations that use Epic. He is also a member of the careEquality Advisory Council, which works to facilitate the national transition to TEFCA-based interoperability.
